Frompt and polite service to greats. McCORMACK'S CHURCHYARD.

A Lincoln county young lady contributes the ollowing pretty little poem

I stood by the graves of those at rest, As the sun was sinking in the golden West; As the winds were sighing low and deep, I sought the place where our forefathers sleep With slow and sad and measured tread, I marked each mound where sleep the dead. This long-forgotten, silent band, Awaiting the call from the unseen land.

In one lone, forsiken lot, With scarce a stone to mark the spot, There sleeps one whom our fathers tell, Years ago was the village belle; But now from the pure flesh undefiled, The daisies of the field grow wild: An emblem of the soul set free, Another life which is to be.

Oh Death, thou grim and sovereign king! This is thy harvest, this thy sting. Man strives an age thy power to cheat, And falls at last down at thy feet. Sons of McCormack, low or high. Look not upon her with irreverent eye. Though they are scattered, one by one, They seek, ere life's meridian 's done, The lonely spot where sleep the dead.

With trembling form and whitened head, I see him now, his step is slow, He finds the grave, his eyes are dim. And all the world is lost to him; He thinks of loved ones buried there, Of the dying gasp, the dying prayer; Thinks of hearts still beating in vain For those who shall never come again The day will come, a glorious day, When all his sorrow shall pass away; And freed from the weight of earthly woes, He'll sweetly sleep in his last repose.
